

Confessions of a Fool: One Mans Search for Purpose

This book is about a singular determined effort by the author to find within himself his own passion and purpose in life at whatever cost, and the costs were high, maybe too high for some. While some might read this book and think the author a genuine fool for having thrown away so much for what they might perceive as so little in return, others will find me an altogether different kind of fool and perhaps even find inspiration in my actions. This book will take you from the moment I walked away from a steady career in the mortgage industry, which was the foundation for everything I had built in this world, to the wonders of my first remembered experience where I felt joy and genuinely inspired. This autobiographical account will honestly detail how I went from working a routine nine-to-five job where I felt chronically apathetic, uninspired, neutered of my will, where I lived the same soulless cycles over and over every day of my life, and with seemingly no possibility for change on the horizon, to the signs I saw in my life that gave me new insight into who I was and the courage to take a magnificent leap of faith with no guarantees at all that I would find what I was ultimately seeking. This book is about the transition between living that uninspired life that would have ultimately led to regret, to the inspired life I live now where I live my dreams every single day. This transition is not, however, without its costs. While we all know the value of the dollar bill, this is the story of a man who forsakes money in search for his own personal and internal value instead. This is a story about hard choices, choices some will only criticize, others might applaud, but only this author gets to live with.
