

The Story of Lawrence Garthe (Classic Reprint)

Excerpt from The Story of Lawrence Garthe
The ladies were expected every moment; so the servant at the door of Mrs. Garners house on Lexington Avenue told Ferdinand Hartley. Accordingly, saying that he would await their return, he entered the drawing-room, which was lighted by a great lamp, with a flame-colored shade, and an open fire of coals, sat down in a low chair, put his hat on the floor, and congratulated himself on this quiet interval, which offered him a chance to marshal his ideas in fair and logical order and decide upon his plan of action. It was, however, no easy matter to concentrate his thoughts. He could hardly account for his own nervousness. Twice in his life before he had made an offer of marriage, in each experience meeting a sharp reverse; but in those cases he had touched upon the subject in cold blood, had attempted to rouse ardor when he had no ardor himself. Now he had no reason for misgiving, for he was absolutely sincere. About the Publisher
